

Steel expands or contracts with the temperature changes. Is this a problem?

Whether a steel frame is mechanically jointed or welded, in a properly constructed and insulated building then thermally induced movement and noise is no more likely than with other materials. Steel framing expands and contracts at rates not too dissimilar from other materials, which means it is unlikely that there will be noise or cornice cracking problems.